IV. Trends in Public Education

Dr. Jillian Darwish, Vice President, Organizational Learning and Innovation, KnowledgeWorks, presented the trends that will impact public education in South Carolina.

V. Student Performance

Chris Minnich, Senior Membership Director, Council of Chief State School Officers, provided an analysis of public education results in South Carolina, the United States, and internationally.

During the discussion period, Mr. Minnich commented that policy does matter, that performance differs between and within schools, and that the ESEA bill, which should be passed by August 2011, will offer more flexibility. Chair Postlewait added that we need to look at what creates high performers and that we need to get away from the one-size-fits-all assumption. It was also noted that there is something problematic happening in South Carolina between fourth and eighth-grade reading.

To reflect on National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) data, Mr. Minnich asked that the Board members break into groups to identify observations, questions, concerns, and ideas. The first group identified building trust as an important issue; the second group identified the need to invest in looking at testing already done; the third group identified the need to determine how we arrived at where we are now based on factors such as the increase in single parents, the need for early intervention in teaching children to read, and the need for creating a forum or task force that will listen instead of mandating from the top down.

The fourth group identified reasons why there are problems retaining good teachers in rural areas and that more needs to be done to enlist and encourage young people to enter the teaching profession. The fifth group determined that there are more problems with students from small areas and dying rural towns. The last group identified the need for recruiting effective teachers and suggested ways to do so. These suggestions included expanding the Teaching Fellows program, paying teacher's aides to stay in the area, improving discipline, passing the Teacher Protection Act, alternative boarding schools, and monetary incentives to attract and keep teachers in high-poverty areas.

Mr. Minnich stated that teachers are not "entitled" and that weak teachers should not remain employed.

The Board watched a video on Chinese schools, and it was noted that they have similar problems to schools in the United States. After the video, there was a discussion period. Comments included the need to send people interested in the teaching profession to mentor principals, that the starting point for teacher education needs to be in the classroom, and that international comparisons show that the United States has a bigger tolerance for poor performance than any other country.

VI. Promising Practices

Chris Minnich updated the Board on promising practices that are yielding dramatically different results in schools in South Carolina and across the nation.

Mr. Minnich stated that a solution for success is high challenge and high support. This includes intervention in inverse proportion to success, ambitious standards, accountability, devolved responsibility, access to best practice and quality professional development, and good data and clear targets.

"Trends Across States" was added as a presentation topic, and a discussion followed. A comment was made that the United States spends more money in overhead than any other country and when we talk about dollars spent, we should include a discussion of regulations.

VII. Policy Implications

The Board discussed the next steps that the SBE may take to influence education policy formation in South Carolina.
